Academics, Researchers, and Consultants are found to be important in defining alternatives as well – either through the long-term process of developing academic theories that are eventually applied to society through policy, or by directly studying or working on issues relevant to current events and helping to debate and develop policy. The media, elections, and public opinion are all found to have only indirect effects on agenda setting or alternatives.

In his book Agendas, Alternatives and Public Policies he proposed that for an issue to get on the political agenda, three flux must encounter: The problem; The solution; The political will. Effectively, if there is no solution to a problem, it would be impossible to get the political attention.

Agendas, Alternatives, and Public Policies by John W. Kingdon

Elevating an idea on the policy agenda requires investments in more than one element and in the ways that the elements can complement one another. Investing in research alone to define a problem, for example, has less chance of success than investing in problem definition and advocacy for proposals that get attached to that problem.
