In theory, conditions are different from functions, they are the elements and characteristics that enable or disable journalism as a social institution in the fight against corruption. Freedom, independence, and diversity are the main conditions of journalism that empower it to perform the functions of (1) watchdog, (2) accountability, and (3) agenda-setter.

Deconstructing Journalism Culture: Toward a Universal Theory

Theories of journalism have followed a sociological turn, a perspective that brings with it questions of power, control, structures, institutions, class, and community: all concepts that, as Waisbord (2014) observes, have been applied to journalism research more than other communication subfields, yielding an area often called "media sociology." Broadly speaking, this approach to journalism ties social structures to symbolic formations, seeking to understand how social reality takes ...

Journalism, like all crafts, requires a structure that defines the proportions of their craft and then the content, and that structure must be visible to those who care to understand it. The mere assertion of objectivity is not such a structure. It is merely a principle that neither constrains nor compels.

DEVELOPMENT JOURNALISM

These elements are that journalists (a) provide a public service; (b) are impartial, neutral, objective, fair, and credible; (c) ought to be autonomous, free, and independent in their work; (d) have a sense of immediacy, actuality, and speed; and (e) have a sense of ethics, validity, and legitimacy.

Findings in recent research suggest that online journalism is much less innovative than many researchers and scholars predicted a decade ago. Research into online journalism has, however, been biased towards a focus on online news journalism, thereby neglecting the magnitude of new styles and genres that are currently emerging online. In this paper the findings of a longitudinal ethnographic ...

"Towards a theory of journalism as practice" by Rhonda Breit

Drawing on the work of Alasdair MacIntyre (1985, 1994), this paper postulates a theory of journalism that distinguishes between the practice of journalism, the practices of business and advertising and the institution of the media corporation, in an attempt to explain why managers and journalists have different views on journalistic quality.

Deconstructing Journalism Culture: Toward a Universal Theory

The theory suggests that journalists have an obligation to provide citizens with thorough, incisive, and useful information. In exchange, the press is provided with freedom from pressures and constraints that could be imposed by government and business interests. Development journalism also calls for comprehensive reporting with a critical edge.

Theories of Journalism - Oxford Research Encyclopedia of ...

In journalism theory, four concepts of news selection have achieved a broader acceptance: gatekeeping, framing, news bias, and news values. 6 In this chapter, we can only focus on the theory of news values. Starting with a brief introduction of the well established concept, we will discuss former attempts to apply this general approach especially on science coverage.

The advocacy continuum: Towards a theory of advocacy in ...

The goal of advocacy is commonly used to distinguish journalism from public relations practice. At the same time, there is a strong tradition of advocacy reporting in journalism that weakens this point of distinction. In an attempt to reconcile this apparent contradiction, this article draws on the concept of a continuum to explain extremes in journalism practice and 'contingency theory ...

Toward a field theory of journalism

To search for a "field" theory of journalism is to search for a theory that explains the entire practice in all of its complexity. In this sense I'm using "field" as a metaphor indicating the kind of search currently underway to discover a theory of "everything" in physics. I have asserted two sub-theories on Rhetorica: 1) a structural bias theory, and 2) a narrative theory.
